broke one of his legs badly. Mary talked to me briefly about Belmont; we are to renew the conversation later on.

July 11, 1962 - Wednesday

I set out this morning in a morning coat for Buckingham Palace, to attend the reception of the Diplomatic Corps by the President of Liberia. We were about 70 strong; divided in order of precedence--I being number 27--we were ushered into the presence. President Tubman is a jolly individual, full of humor, given--so it is said--to extravagant personal expenditures. I referred to my having visited him twenty years ago in Liberia. I wish I had aged as slightly as he has.

I lunched at Bucks with Bill Tyler. He was quietly dining with an English friend last night at the Connaught Hotel, when a telephone call from Washington was announced to him. It was the Secretary of State saying that he and the President intended to submit his name forthwith to the Congress for appointment as Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs. In view of Bill's almost excessive modesty, this is quite a poser for him. It is obviously a tremendous compliment, since it has been more or less taken for granted that this post, vacated by Foy Kohler, would be filled by a political appointee. For the moment this is a dread secret, but I do not anticipate any difficulty, if his name is sent up, in its being approved by the Foreign Relations Committee.

Yale Newman of ABC brought his President, Leonard Goldensen, and his wife to see me.

The newspapers today are filled with stories about the success of A T & T's telecast satellite. Ten years ago, any one who might have suggested such a development as being possible would have been dismissed as being stark, staring mad.

Dean Storey, Chairman of the Associated Conference Board, called on me.
